

COVID-19 FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS

Revised March 19, 2020

Contents

UNION MEETINGS AND OTHER GATHERINGS	2
Scheduled court, labour board or arbitration hearings	3
Collective bargaining and other meetings with employers	3
DECLARATIONS OF EMERGENCY	4
REFUSING UNSAFE WORK BECAUSE OF COVID-19	4
Do employees have the right to refuse work if concerned about exposure to COVID-19?	5
What about health agency advice about large public gatherings?	5
What are the potential consequences of refusing to work over COVID-19 concerns?	5
If I cannot refuse to work, what should I do to protect myself?	5
Does my employer have to provide me with safety equipment to protect against COVID-19?	6
DISCLOSURE OF PANDEMIC ILLNESS	6
Do employees have to tell their employer that they have a COVID-19 illness, or that they may have been exposed to the virus?	6
Mandatory disclosure of pandemic illness will likely be reasonable	6
What if an employee does not disclose a pandemic illness, or an exposure to a source of infection?	7
Can the employer stop an employee from coming to work?	7
WHAT HAPPENS WHEN EMPLOYEES ARE ABSENT FROM WORK BECAUSE OF COVID-19 ILLNESS OR EXPOSURE?	7
When is self-isolation required?	8
What is self-isolation?	8
Employer policies about social distancing	9

What steps should an employee take who decides to self-isolate?	9
Will employees who self-isolate be paid during their absence from work?	10
What substantiation can employers require from employees after a COVID-19 absence?	11
Can employees work from home when they are in self-isolation?	11
EMPLOYER POLICIES ON PERSONAL TRAVEL DURING PANDEMIC	12
What can employers require of employees who have travelled?	12
What medical substantiation might be required upon return from travel to a Level 3 or 4 country or region?	12
Can an employer restrict other personal travel?	13
EMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ISSUES	14
Can I apply for Employment Insurance sickness benefit if I have to self-isolate or quarantine?	14
Can I apply for EI sickness benefits if I have been laid off due to COVID-19?	14
Do I need a medical note to access EI sickness benefits for self-isolation?	14
What should I do if I need to access EI sickness benefits for the virus?	14
Are there other income-support programs offered by the Government?	15
What if I don't qualify for Employment Insurance sick benefits?	15
Emergency Care Benefit, Emergency Support Benefit, GST Credit, Enhanced Child Benefit	15
CAN I APPLY FOR WORKER'S COMPENSATION IF I CONTRACTED COVID-19 AT WORK?	16

INTRODUCTION

COVID-19 is a pandemic illness. Public health agencies are monitoring the outbreak of this illness and providing public health and infection control guidance. That guidance is evolving rapidly. In the meantime, many workplace issues are developing about COVID-19.

UNION MEETINGS AND OTHER GATHERINGS

Some meetings, educational and other events have already been cancelled by Unifor. Local unions should consider the interests of our members in light of the advice and directions provided by public health agencies in your province.

For the immediate future, Canada's public health agencies are recommending "social distancing" and reduced travel. In some provinces, public health agencies have issued directions that prohibit large gatherings. This means that many more gatherings will be cancelled.

If membership meetings must be held (for instance, a ratification meeting for a collective bargaining settlement), it cannot be business as usual. Membership meetings may have to be broken into smaller meetings with a reduced number of participants and in a larger space so that the recommended social distancing measures can be maintained. Be aware however that this alternative arrangement is not without risk. Local union leaders and national union staff will then be exposed to numbers of people for a longer period of time.

It is advised to conduct risk assessments on any Unifor meetings or other gatherings. Risk-informed decision-making for mass gatherings during COVID-19 global outbreak (<https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/diseases/2019-novel-coronavirus-infection/health-professionals/mass-gatherings-risk-assesment.html>)

Scheduled court, labour board or arbitration hearings

In some provinces, courts and tribunals have announced that some cases will be postponed or dealt with by phone or video conference. Some arbitrators have communicated their interest in taking pandemic-related steps to reduce risk. Arbitrators may be contacted for directions on adjournments or for assistance with making alternative hearing arrangements. Many will be pleased to cooperate in ways to reduce travel. If an adjournment is going to be requested, consent from the employer should first be requested.

If a meeting or hearing cannot be cancelled or adjourned, alternative meeting methods may be considered. This may include telephone or video conferencing.

Steps should be taken to preserve time limits for grievances and referrals to arbitration. This is particularly important in some jurisdictions where an arbitrator may have no power to relieve against missed time limits.

Collective bargaining and other meetings with employers

Consider whether scheduled meetings can be postponed to a later date. In some circumstances, a telephone or video meeting might be a suitable alternative.

If an in-person meeting is required, only individuals who are absolutely essential should attend. All participants should be told in advance to consider their own health and the health of others when deciding whether to attend if they are feeling ill. Attendees should also be encouraged to follow other public health recommendations regarding personal protective practices (hand hygiene, respiratory etiquette, maintaining recommended distance from others, and staying home if ill).

If meetings must be held, consider changing the venue to prevent crowding. In the case of an arbitration or mediation, if only one hearing or mediation room is booked, arrange additional break-out rooms, instead of having people meeting and congregating in congested hallways or common spaces.

Meetings of large numbers of persons may have to be broken up into several smaller meetings. Advise all those attending to take guidance from public health agencies and consider their own health and the health of others when deciding whether to attend if they are feeling ill.

If travel to your meeting or hearing location is required, consider whether travelling alone in a personal vehicle is an option rather than taking buses, trains, or planes.

DECLARATIONS OF EMERGENCY

What is an emergency declaration?

In Canada, laws in each jurisdiction empower governments to declare a state of emergency. The Canada Emergencies Act allows the federal government to declare a national emergency. These laws can be declared to apply when there is an imminent event that requires prompt coordination to protect the health, safety or welfare of people, or to limit damage to property or the environment.

Emergency orders

Provinces have declared the spread of COVID-19 to be a public or health emergency. A declaration of an emergency streamlines the legislative process, by giving extensive power to the government to make executive orders to contain the emergency.

For example in Ontario, as of March 17, 2020, there have been two emergency orders issued pursuant to the declaration of emergency. The first order is a legally enforceable closure of a number of non-essential public establishments. The second order is a legally enforceable ban on gatherings exceeding 50 people.

How do emergency orders affect employees?

Emergency orders issued under provincial statutes can affect employment. Measures taken pursuant to an order may cause businesses to close and lay off employees.

Two provinces have existing job-protected leaves of absence that apply when a person cannot work because of a declared emergency. Section 50.1 of Ontario's Employment Standards Act contains a job-protected leave of absence in cases of a "declared emergency". Pursuant to this provision, employees who cannot work because of an emergency order are immediately eligible for an unpaid leave of absence for the duration of the emergency order. This applies as well where an emergency order creates a need for the employee to care for family members. It may apply for example, where a daycare is closed during a declared emergency. In Nova Scotia, employees are entitled to the same kind of leave.

On March 17, 2020, Saskatchewan added a protected leave for public health emergencies, retroactive to March 6, 2020. Other provinces are likely to enact similar changes.

REFUSING UNSAFE WORK BECAUSE OF COVID-19

Do employees have the right to refuse work if concerned about exposure to COVID-19?

Workers in Canada have the right to a healthy and safe work environment. Health and safety legislation requires employers to take reasonable steps to protect the health and safety of their employees. This may include responding to new and potentially hazardous situations, such as the COVID-19 virus.

In every jurisdiction in Canada, workers have the right to refuse work if they honestly and reasonably believe their health and safety is in danger in their workplaces; if they communicate this belief to their supervisors; and if the seriousness of the perceived danger justifies the work refusal.

Whether a work refusal is justified will largely depend on the facts. The measures that an employer takes to ensure a healthy and safe work environment will be taken into consideration and weighed against the potential risks to workers.

Workers should be cautioned that Tribunals and Arbitration Boards have largely sided with employers when workers have refused work over contagious infection concerns in the workplace. In Hogue-Burzynski v. VIA Rail Canada [2006] (<https://www.canada.ca/en/occupational-health-and-safety-tribunal-canada/programs/decisions/archived/2006/ohstc-2006-015.html>), four workers refused to work out of concerns that a train had not been cleaned properly following an outbreak of Norwalk virus or a similar illness. The Canada Occupational Health and Safety Tribunal determined that the employer's efforts to sanitize the train, including disinfecting all hard surfaces and steam cleaning soft surfaces, were reasonably practicable to eliminate and control the risk of further illness.

The steps taken by your employer to limit the spread of COVID-19 will likely factor into whether a work refusal is considered reasonable. Such efforts might include:

- Installing hand sanitizer stations in high-traffic areas;
- Making hand sanitizer available in washrooms;
- Directing cleaning staff to sanitize high traffic surfaces and frequently-touched objects (door knobs, etc.);
- Reducing activities that require physical contact between workers and/or members of the public, if possible; and
- Recommending that employees wash their hands frequently; practice social distancing; and stay home from work if they exhibit symptoms of COVID-19.

The nature of your workplace may also factor into whether a work refusal is reasonable. In Hogue-Burzynski v. VIA Rail Canada [2006], the Health and Safety Officer who first investigated the work refusal determined the nature of the employee's work involved inherent risk to exposure to illness by virtue of the fact that they serviced large numbers of the public on a daily basis. If your workplace regularly requires you to provide services to members of the public, including those who may be ill, or employs a large number of workers at the workplace at the same time, it may be determined that exposure to viral infection is a risk inherent to the workplace.

Your risk of serious complications from COVID-19 may also be relevant to the reasonableness of a work refusal. Health officials have warned that older individuals, those with certain conditions, such as lung or heart disease or individuals with suppressed immune systems are at greater risk of becoming seriously ill from COVID-19. It is possible that individuals at greater risk will require heightened accommodation from employers.

What about health agency advice about large public gatherings?

Public health agencies in most provinces have advised or directed that large public gatherings should be cancelled. This does not necessarily mean that large workplaces must close. Employees should not assume that the government has given them permission to refuse work if their workplace contains a large number of employees or a large number of customers.

Public health agency directions to cancel large public gatherings may be relevant to the reasonableness of a belief that a workplace is unsafe because of the risk of COVID-19. As outlined above, when considering whether to refuse work, workers must weigh both the risks of transmission against the risks that are inherent to their work, and also the steps their employer has taken to reduce the risk of a COVID-19 outbreak in their workplaces.

What are the potential consequences of refusing to work over COVID-19 concerns?

Refusing to work in defiance of an employer direction to work is insubordination. An employer's response to insubordination might be discipline. If an employee is disciplined for refusing to work, and a Tribunal or Arbitrator determines that the refusal was reasonable, the discipline might be overturned. If the refusal is found to be unreasonable, the discipline may stand.

Does my employer have to provide me with safety equipment to protect against COVID-19?

Occupational health and safety laws require employers to take every precaution reasonable in the circumstances for the protection of the worker. In the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, reasonable precautions to prevent the transmission of the illness to workers may include providing workers with additional safety equipment. The kind of equipment that is appropriate will vary by occupation. It will depend on the danger to the individual worker in light of the current knowledge about how the virus is transmitted. Guidance about how to combat known dangers about COVID-19 can be obtained from the Public Health Agency of Canada (<https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/diseases/2019-novel-coronavirus-infection/health-professionals/public-health-measures-mitigate-covid-19.html>) and provincial health agencies.

If I cannot refuse to work, what should I do to protect myself?

If you have concerns over the measures your employer is taking or failing to take in response to COVID-19, you should raise them with your supervisor, union representatives or health and safety representatives. Health and Safety Committees should work with employers to develop a plan for minimizing the risk of a COVID-19 outbreak in your workplace.

DISCLOSURE OF PANDEMIC ILLNESS

Do employees have to tell their employer that they have a COVID-19 illness, or that they may have been exposed to the virus?

Employer policies should be designed to encourage self-disclosure by allowing employees to continue working from home where possible, and protecting their wages and benefits when they cannot continue working.

Mandatory disclosure of pandemic illness will likely be reasonable

It is likely reasonable for an employer to require employees to self-disclose a pandemic illness or even the possible exposure to the source of that illness. Occupational health and safety laws generally require employers to protect workers from health and safety hazards on the job. This is a basis for the employer to require disclosure. Employers may have additional responsibilities in a pandemic. Public health authorities may require employers to take specific measures to address public health emergencies.

Policies requiring employee disclosure must not offend human rights laws. For example, they cannot require some employees to disclose based on race or national origin. Any required reporting must be reasonable and bona fide, taking into account the work actually performed. An employer might reasonably, for instance, ask any individuals returning from travel to high-risk countries, to self-disclose and self-isolate.

Where an employee self-identifies as having been exposed to a pandemic illness, an employer has a continuing duty to accommodate that worker, up to the point of undue hardship. Employers must consider such things as whether a worker can continue to work, possibly in a different way. Working from home is possible for some employees.

What if an employee does not disclose a pandemic illness, or an exposure to a source of infection?

Where an employee is infected, or is aware they may have been exposed and there is a risk of exposure of an infectious disease to others, and an employee fails to disclose that risk, the employee is likely to be in violation of employer policies where such policies exist. It may also be a violation of occupational health and safety laws that require employees to report workplace hazards. Even if there is not a policy, the employee could be disciplined.

Can the employer stop an employee from coming to work?

In appropriate cases, even where there has been no disclosure of a possible COVID-19 risk, an employer may have a limited right to hold an employee out of work if the employee is not fit for duty. If an employer has reasonable concerns about the safety of other employees or the public, it can ask the employee to provide medical or other evidence that they are fit to work. But if the request is not reasonable, and the employee remains off work, the employer could be required to pay the lost wages of the employee.

If an employer is following the direction of a health agency in requiring proof of fitness to work, this requirement would likely not be found to be unreasonable. For example, the employer may know of an employee's recent travel history, or contacts with infected persons.

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN EMPLOYEES ARE ABSENT FROM WORK BECAUSE OF COVID-19 ILLNESS OR EXPOSURE?

Public health agencies have issued guidelines about social distancing. This includes when we should avoid crowds, isolate from others, and monitor our own health. See for example PHAC, Community-based measures to mitigate the spread of coronavirus disease (COVID-19) in Canada (<https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/diseases/2019-novel-coronavirus-infection/health-professionals/public-health-measures-mitigate-covid-19.html>)

These guidelines describe a range of protective measures that individuals should take, including self-monitoring, and self-isolation.

When is self-isolation required?

While public health guidelines are changing rapidly. The Public Health Agency of Canada is currently recommending a 14 day period of self-isolation where:

- you have a suspected or confirmed cases of COVID-19;
- you have returned from travel outside of Canada within the last 14 days; and/or
- you have had close contact with someone who has a probable or confirmed diagnosis of COVID-19

The Public Health Agency of Canada currently recommends a 14 day period of self-monitoring where you have no symptoms of COVID-19 (e.g. shortness of breath, a cough and/or fever) and:

- you believe you may have been exposed to a person with COVID-19; and/or
- you have had close contact with older adults or medically vulnerable people

Some provinces are exempting health-care workers from the recommendation to self-isolate for 14 days after international travel, and are instead asking those individuals to return to work but to self-monitor for that period. Health care workers who have returned from international travel should consult with their local public health authority for specific guidance.

For more information on when self-isolation and self-monitoring are recommended, see: <https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/publications/diseases-conditions/self-monitoring-self-isolation-isolation-for-covid-19.html>

Unifor members should continue to monitor public health guidelines in their own province for guidance about when self-isolation is recommended.

Note that the guidance for employees of the same employer may vary depending on the province in which they work. A VIA-Rail employee in Montreal may receive different public health guidance than a VIA Rail employee in Halifax.

What is self-isolation?

Employees who have been asked to self isolate should take the following steps:

- Stay at home;
- Do not go into public places;
- Do not take public transportation, taxis or ride-sharing programs;
- Keep a distance of at least two meters between yourself and other people
- Wear a mask if you leave your house or are within 2 meters of other people;
- Practice good hand hygiene;
- Limit the number and duration of visitors to your home;
- Cover your coughs and sneezes;

For more information about how to isolate at home when you have COVID-19, see: <https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/publications/diseases-conditions/covid-19-how-to-isolate-at-home.html>

Employer policies about social distancing

Employer policies about COVID-19 are likely to require or encourage employees to follow public health guidelines about hygiene and social distancing, including self-monitoring and self-isolation.

Employer policies may set out additional circumstances in which employees are asked to self-isolate. The reasonableness of these policies will likely depend on whether they are consistent with health agency guidelines. In all but exceptional cases, employees should follow the principle of “work now, grieve later,” which requires employees to comply with an employer policy now, and then seek redress through a grievance.

What steps should an employee take who decides to self-isolate?

Employees have a general obligation to notify employers when they are unable to attend work. This principle applies where an employee is in self-isolation because of COVID-19. Employees should report absences as soon as they become aware that they will need to be absent from work. Employees should advise their employers of the general reason for their absence from work and the date when they expect to return to work.

Collective agreements and/or employer policies often set out the circumstances in which an employee is required to provide documentation, such as a medical note, to support an absence from work. Wherever possible, employees who are in self-isolation should seek clarification from their employers about whether a medical note will be required for an absence related to COVID-19. Public health agencies advise that individuals should not attend at a doctor's office or hospital with mere suspicions of COVID-19. This may mean that employees absent due to COVID-19 may not have any medical substantiation. The Government of Canada has decided to waive medical documentation requirements for Employment Insurance in COVID-19 exposure cases. A pandemic illness strains the health care system such that employer demands for medical notes in every case ought to be relaxed. Unifor and other trade unions oppose employer requirements to provide doctor's notes for all absences, for exactly this reason.

The Government of Canada has decided to waive medical documentation requirements for Employment Insurance in COVID-19 exposure cases. Some provincial governments have publicly discouraged employers from seeking medical notes and some have announced an intention to pass legislation to stop employers from seeking medical notes.

Will employees who self-isolate be paid during their absence from work?

Whether an employee who is in self-isolation is entitled to be paid by their employer is uncertain and will depend on the circumstances. Employees who are self-isolating because they are experiencing symptoms will likely have access to any applicable sick leave benefits. In cases where an employee is not experiencing symptoms but is self-isolating, some collective agreements may provide benefits to employees in quarantine and/or setting out employment leaves (with or without pay) that the employee may access. Many collective agreements may not have specific provisions dealing with this situation, but employees may have access to other accrued benefits, such as banked vacation or overtime. In addition, certain jurisdictions may provide statutory leaves of employment (with or without pay) that an employee in self-isolation may be entitled to access.

When this issue arises, the following circumstances may be relevant to determining whether an employee is entitled to be paid during their self-isolation:

- The reasons why the employee is in self-isolation (for example, self-isolation following voluntary international travel may be treated differently than self-isolation after local contact with a probable or confirmed case of COVID-19);
- Whether the employee was directed to self-isolate by public health authorities, by the employer, or whether the employee voluntarily decided to self-isolate;
- The nature of the employee's work;
- The nature of the employer's workplace; and
- The content of relevant public health advisories at the time the employee is in self-isolation.

Federal and Provincial governments have announced new income-replacement programs and/or changes to existing programs (such as Employment Insurance). Some of these changes are likely to provide income replacement benefits to workers who have lost income because of the COVID-19 crisis, including to employees who have needed to self-isolate. For information on current EI benefits for quarantined employees, see the answer to "Employment Insurance Issues" below. Unifor members should continue to monitor government announcements about income replacement programs.

What substantiation can employers require from employees after a COVID-19 absence?

Depending on the circumstances, it may be reasonable for an employer to require medical documentation at the end of an absence, to satisfy the employer's obligation to ensure that the employee can safely return to work. The current pandemic is an exceptional factor that may change those usual rules. When employees seek a return to work after a COVID-19-related absence, employers will be concerned about the safety of others. However, these exceptional circumstances may also make it unreasonable to require employees to provide medical substantiation in every case. The employee may not have seen a doctor, in accordance with public health guidelines. These situations will have to be dealt with on a case-by case basis.

Current guidance from health authorities is that if no symptoms are evident after 14 days of an exposure risk, employees may return to work. We can expect employers to require medical substantiation where an employee has had a diagnosed COVID-19 illness or a confirmed exposure risk. Employees who have had a confirmed COVID-19 illness will have been monitored throughout the illness by a public health agency. They will likely be isolated until such time as the public health agency confirms that the individual is no longer infectious. Currently, public health agencies make that determination by relying on two consecutive negative tests, at least 24 hours apart (<https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/diseases/2019-novel-coronavirus-infection/health-professionals/interim-guidance-cases-contacts.html>)

Can employees work from home when they are in self-isolation?

Many employers and employees are arranging ways for employees to work at home where that is possible, regardless of any possible exposure. This is an example of the "social distancing" recommended by public health agencies.

Employees who are in self-isolation but who are not currently experiencing symptoms may be required by their employer to work from home where possible. In those cases the employer would be required to maintain the employee's pay and benefits. The Employer should not require an employee who is in self-isolation due to an identified risk to work from home in such a way that would require them to break their self-isolation or expose others to COVID-19.

Employees who are absent from work because they are unwell, including because of a probable or confirmed case of COVID-19, will be considered absent from work because of illness and in general should not be required to work while they are unwell. The employee's entitlement to pay and benefits would then depend on the available sick leave or wage replacement benefits.

EMPLOYER POLICIES ON PERSONAL TRAVEL DURING PANDEMIC

What can employers require of employees who have travelled?

Personal travel warnings or business travel restrictions should be based on current public health information and government travel health notices. The list of countries with active travel health notices is established by the Government of Canada and posted online (<https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/services/diseases/2019-novel-coronavirus-infection/latest-travel-health-advice.html>).

In most cases, an employer cannot prohibit an employee from personal travel to a country or region that is subject to a travel health notice. However, there may be exceptional cases in which an employer's business interests would be sufficiently affected by an employee's possible absence that the employer can require the employee to not travel. An employee may play a critical role so that an extended absence would harm the employer's operations.

However, it will be appropriate for employers to warn employees against personal travel to any country or region that is subject to a Level 3 or Level 4 government travel health notice. Level 3 warns Canadians to avoid non-essential travel to those countries or regions. Level 4 warns Canadians to avoid all travel to those countries or regions. Currently, the government of Canada has established a global travel advisory, which means that everyone is advised to avoid all non-essential travel outside of Canada until further notice. Essentially, all countries outside of Canada (including the US) are at level 3 status.

It is likely reasonable in the circumstances of the COVID-19 pandemic for employers to require employees to provide their employer with advance notice if they intend to travel to any country or region that is subject to a travel health notice so that the employer may assess any possible business-related issues.

Be aware that to the extent your employer offers private extended health insurance, any travel insurance included in that benefit package may have been changed because of COVID-19.

What medical substantiation might be required upon return from travel to a Level 3 or 4 country or region?

It is also reasonable for employers to ask employees to undergo appropriate health screening after travel during a pandemic. This may include self-monitoring for symptoms in accordance with public health agency guidelines. It could include requirements to remain away from work for a period of time recommended by health professionals for individuals who have been exposed (at least 14 days). This would be the case even if the employee is not experiencing symptoms of illness upon their return.

All individuals should understand the risk of travel outside of Canada in the current circumstances.

Can an employer restrict other personal travel?

It will not be reasonable for an employer to expect employees to provide advance notice of personal travel to a country or region that is not subject to a travel health notice. However, the government's travel advisory website does advise individuals to self-monitor for 14 days (for fever, cough or difficulty breathing) following any trip outside of Canada and in some jurisdictions like Quebec, self-isolation after an out-of-country trip is required. In those cases, an employee who chooses to travel knowing that as a result they will have to self-isolate after their return, and therefore miss work, may expose themselves to discipline.

At the same time, employees may have pressing family obligations that compel them to travel even against the advice of public health agencies.

Under current conditions caused by COVID-19, everyone should monitor the active travel health notices on the website of the Public Health Agency of Canada and advise their employer before their return to work after any travel outside of Canada.

EMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ISSUES

Can I apply for Employment Insurance sickness benefit if I have to self-isolate or quarantine?

Yes, you can apply for benefits if you have to self-isolate or quarantine due to COVID-19. The Employment Insurance (EI) sickness benefit provides up to 55% of a worker's pre-illness income for up to 15 weeks to a maximum of $573 per week, for workers who have worked at least 600 insured hours in the past 52 weeks.

There is usually a one-week waiting period for EI sick benefits, but the Government has waived this waiting period for those who are in quarantine or self-isolation due to COVID-19. This means that a worker who qualifies for EI sickness benefits is eligible for EI sickness benefits for both weeks of a two-week quarantine.

In order to be eligible for EI sickness benefits for the virus, you must have had a quarantine imposed upon you by law or by a public health official or be under self-isolation. The Employment Insurance COVID-19 information line is currently advising that if you have been asked by your employer, a doctor or a nurse to quarantine or self-isolate, or if you live in the same household as an individual who has been asked to self-isolate or quarantine by their employer, doctor, nurse, or under legislation, you are also eligible for EI sickness benefits immediately.

Can I apply for EI sickness benefits if I have been laid off due to COVID-19?

If you are laid off from your workplace you should apply for Employment Insurance Regular benefits. There have not (as of March 17, 2020) been any changes to regular EI benefits. A one-week waiting period will apply unless the Government changes this.

Do I need a medical note to access EI sickness benefits for self-isolation?

Ordinarily, a medical certificate is required in order to collect EI sick benefits. No medical note is required for the two-week quarantine period for COVID-19. The Employment Insurance COVID-19 information line reports that as long as an individual is under quarantine or has have been asked to self-isolate or quarantine by their doctor, an employer, a public health official or under a statute, no medical documentation will be required. A medical note will only be required if the individual seeks sick leave benefits for more than the two-week quarantine period.

What should I do if I need to access EI sickness benefits for the virus?

The Government has set up a dedicated line for those seeking EI sick benefits for self-isolation or quarantine. If you need to file for EI sickness benefits, you should first file online (<https://www.canada.ca/en/services/benefits/ei/ei-sickness/apply.html>), and then call the EI Coronavirus line to advise them of your application. They will help ensure your Application is processed according to the special rules in place for COVID-19. Processing times are still estimated at 1 to 28 business days, but the Government is working on setting up a priority processing system.

You can call the EI Coronavirus line at 1-833-381-2725 (Teletypewriter (TTY): 1-800-529-3742) between the hours of 8:00 and 4:30 to access further information.

Are there other income-support programs offered by the Government?

The Government has announced enhancements to its Employment Insurance Work-Sharing program. The program is designed to prevent temporary layoffs, and provides income support to workers where there has been a temporary reduction in labour needs beyond the control of the employer. More enhancements may be announced, but the Government it will waive the waiting period for employers to apply for Work-Sharing, and that the maximum eligible timeframe employers and workers can access the program will be increased from 38 weeks to 76. It is employers, not individual workers who make an initial application to the Work-Sharing program.

What if I don't qualify for Employment Insurance sick benefits?

On March 18, 2020 the federal government announced income support programs for workers and others who do not qualify for Employment Insurance. A summary of the available income replacement measures in that announcement are below.

Emergency Care Benefit: Total Funding $10 billion

- Provide up to $900 every two weeks for up to 15 weeks.
- Flat-payment benefit will be administered through CRA and provide income support to
 - Workers, including the self-employed, who are quarantined or sick with COVID-19 but do not qualify for EI sickness benefits
 - Workers, including the self-employed, who are taking care of a family member who is sick with COVID-19
 - Parents with children who require care or supervision due to school closures and are unable to earn employment income irrespective of whether or not they qualify for EI.
- Canadians will be required to attest that they meet the eligibility requirements and will need to re-attest every two weeks.

Emergency Support Benefit: Total Funding $5 billion

- Provide income support similar to the level provided through EI for workers and self-employed who are not eligible for EI and are facing unemployment.

GST Credit: Total Funding $5.5 billion

- One-time special payment through the GST credit by May 2020. Benefit will double the maximum annual GSTC payment for the 2019-20 benefit year.

Enhanced Child Benefit: Total Funding $1.9 billion

- 3.5 million families with children will receive an increase in maximum annual Canada Child Benefit by $300 per kid. Average increase will be $550 per family. This payment will arrive in May with the GST cheque

CAN I APPLY FOR WORKER'S COMPENSATION IF I CONTRACTED COVID-19 AT WORK?

Some employees will contract COVID-19 in the course of their work.

In order to be eligible for workers compensation insurance benefits for COVID-19, a worker will have to prove that the COVID-19 was contracted in the course of the employee's work, rather than through other exposure.

In the past, Worker's Compensation Boards in Ontario and Quebec have provided benefits to individuals who have contracted either SARS or H1N1 at work. In one case, a worker suffered permanent side effects and received replacement wages well beyond their recovery from SARS. The employee was unable to return to their pre-illness job due to serious, permanent side effects from the illness.

Rules in each province are different. Entitlement may be more obvious if the employee's work inherently exposes them to a risk of infection significantly greater than the general public. Entitlement may be more obvious as well if the communicable disease is present in the employee's workplace.

Each province's Worker's Compensation Board will identify specific criteria for making a claim for work-related COVID-19 illness. Each Board will provide guidance about how a COVID-19 diagnosis is required to be proved.

Worker's Compensation benefits will not be available for employees who are not ill but have been laid off or required to self-isolate or quarantine because of the COVID-19 pandemic.

How do I apply for compensation for COVID-19?

If you have contracted COVID-19 in your workplace, you should report it immediately to your employer, and to the Worker's Compensation Board in your province. Under normal circumstances you would also be required to report the injury to your doctor. However, individuals are being strongly advised to call public health authorities rather than go to a doctor's office or hospital with COVID-19. The employer is generally required to report a workplace illness, including COVID-19.