Trade deals must help workers

Canada’s trade deal with Europe is being pushed through Parliament without proper consideration of the impact on working people or the country as a whole, Unifor warned a visiting group of Danish parliamentarians.

“I can tell you that ratification is moving rapidly through Canada – almost at an irresponsible pace,” said Naureen Rizvi, Ontario Regional Director, in her speech on February 9 at the Danish Consulate in Toronto.

Rizvi stated that the proposed Canada-European Union Comprehensive Economic and Trade Agreement, or CETA, is all-too typical of the kind of deals negotiated when governments fail to consider the needs of workers.

As Canada has seen with the North American Free Trade Agreement, NAFTA, trade deals that put a higher

Striking Delastek workers keep spirits up

After more than 22 months on strike, Unifor members at Local 1209 continue their fight against Delastek, in Grand-Mère, a Quebec-based employer.

Delastek, a subcontractor in the aerospace industry, notably for Bombardier, has been able to continue its operations, despite Quebec’s anti-scab law.

“This dispute demonstrates the complete power imbalance between a unionized group and the employer when scabs do the jobs of unionized workers,” explained Quebec Director Renaud Gagné.

The dispute is rooted in the division of work between production, covered by the collective agreement, and research and development, which is not part of the bargaining unit. In the union’s view, it is clear that workers in research and development are doing production work and prolonging the strike.

During a visit to the company by Labour Department inspectors, the workers in the plant claimed they were working on parts intended for the CSeries and that these parts came under research and development. However, Unifor learned from workers in the CSeries shops that the aircraft is no longer in development but rather in the production phase. If this is the case, the work currently being performed is in contravention of the law.

Unifor has appealed to Bombardier to assist in ending the strike but it has refused to interfere in the labour dispute or with the Quebec government, which owns a stake in the CSeries.

Hope remains. Gagné said, “We are awaiting the report of the government inspectors, after which we will take the appropriate action in the courts.”

really means a lot to them,” said Paulo Ribeiro, Unifor National Representative.

The 29 workers on strike, seeking to negotiate the second collective agreement, are members of Local 1285.

“This company makes large profits off the backs of workers by exploiting a workforce of marginalized workers and immigrants hired through temporary agencies.”

Most workers at the Brampton location make about $12.70 per hour and pay for their own benefits. None make more than $14.80, while in Montreal the Vast Auto workers make between $18 to $21.80 per hour.

The rally took place at the Vast Auto location in Scarborough a week to the day after Vast Auto walked away from the table. In addition to the rally Unifor members leafleted and urged customers not to shop at Vast Auto until a fair deal is reached.

priority on the desires of big companies or corporations than the needs of citizens tend to result in a race to the bottom and good jobs shift to low-wage contract work.

“Explaining that trade agreements have improved shareholder value or the competitive position of businesses in world markets, means nothing to the displaced factory worker who can’t pay the bills,” Rizvi said.

Under NAFTA, for instance, Canada’s manufacturing trade deficit with Mexico has grown 700 per cent, to $25 billion in 2015. Half of that is in cars and car parts.

One thing NAFTA and CETA have in common is investor-State Disputes Settlement clauses, or ISDS, which Rizvi warned is a dangerous provision. Under NAFTA’s ISDS clause, Canada has been sued more than 35 times by private investors – more than any other developed country.

Rizvi asked pointedly, “Why can General Motors sue Canada to safeguard its investment, when Canadian workers don’t have the same existing protections to sue General Motors for exploiting unfair labour laws in Mexico?”

Unifor’s position is to support trade, but fair trade. Rizvi underscored this point by telling the Danish officials that trade deals must be negotiated in a manner that is fair and transparent, and with the primary goal of improving the lives of working people.

Neither CETA nor NAFTA are that sort of trade deal.

“Unifor will continue to speak out in opposition to CETA,” she said.

On February 16, Prime Minister Trudeau will address the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France, a day after the European legislature is expected hold a ratification vote on CETA. Next the majority of the member states will hold individual ratification votes, and in some cases referendums, before the deal is finalized. Here in Canada, legislation to enact CETA, Bill C-30, is still before the House of Commons, members are encouraged to contact their member of parliament to share their concerns. The attack during evening prayer at the Centre Culturel Islamique de Québec was shocking but it exposed the daily lived reality faced by many Muslims who encounter hate and Islamophobia.

In a show of solidarity with the Muslim community, Unifor flags were also proudly displayed at rallies in Sydney, London, Ottawa and Vancouver. A candlelight vigil was held in Nanaimo, BC, while in several cities, including St. John’s, Newfoundland, members symbolically created a human shield around the local mosque. Unifor recognizes Pink Shirt Day, celebrated annually on the last Wednesday in February, to support the important commitment to a safe, harassment free environment at work and school.

All members are asked to participate in Pink Shirt Day, which happens on Wednesday February 22 this year. By wearing a pink shirt you can send a visible message against homophobic bullying and all forms of bullying.

Pink Shirt Day began in Berwick, Nova Scotia in 2007 when David Shepherd, Travis Price and a group of students defended their peer who was bullied for wearing a pink shirt. In a commitment of solidarity people have been wearing pink shirts and sharing images online to add their voice and say no to homophobic bullying and harassment.

Help to organize your workplace to participate in Pink Shirt Day this year, but don’t let it end there. Make a promise to act, speak out against bullying and offer kindness every day.

If you have a Pink Shirt Day story or photo, share it! Email communications@unifor.org or post your photo online at Facebook.com/UniforCanada or tag #Unifor on Twitter.

Unifor donates $10,000 to ice storm relief

On February 9, members of Local 506 Sandy Brideau and Ronald Benoit presented, a cheque on behalf of the national union, to the Red Cross for $10,000 towards the relief efforts in New Brunswick.

“I am very touched by the support from our great union,” said Brideau, President of Local 506. “It feels good to have solidarity from across the country, especially when something like this happens.”

More than a week after freezing rain blasted much of the province thousands of New Brunswickers were still without power. The storm affected most residents, with the worst-hit communities along the Acadian peninsula on the northeastern coast. Some residents resorted to heating their homes with barbeques and generators, but this resulted in two deaths from carbon monoxide poisoning and over 34 hospitalizations. The Armed Forces were also called in to assist with clean up so crews could work to restore power to the nearly 200,000 affected homes and businesses.

Unifor has been swift to respond to emergencies such as these through the capacity of the Social Justice Fund and through special collections and donations from regional councils, locals and the National Executive Board. The ice storm relief donation was made after the National Executive Board approved the amount with a unanimous decision.

“Locals in New Brunswick immediately took action to show support for their neighbours,” said Lana Payne, Atlantic Regional Director. “Our members are very involved in their communities and it’s especially evident during times like these.”
